

Dear Open Dental Software Hiring Manager,

I'm reaching out to apply for this opportunity because it represents the kind of work I've been steadily working toward over the past few years.

My path into tech didn't start in a traditional way. I spent several years working in customer-facing roles, where I learned how to communicate clearly, stay patient under pressure, and take ownership of my responsibilities. During that time, I realized I wanted to build something more long-term for myself, which led me to begin learning web development and design.

Since then, I've been actively training and building my skills through structured programs and hands-on projects. I've worked through a full stack development program, completed a data analytics certification, and spent a lot of time outside of coursework practicing what I've learned. What I've found is that I genuinely enjoy the process of turning ideas into something people can interact with—especially when it comes to layout, design, and making sure things work well across different devices.

I know there are candidates who may have more experience than I do, but what I bring is consistency, a strong work ethic, and a willingness to keep improving. I take learning seriously, and I've shown that by continuing to build my skills while working full-time. I'm also someone who values structure, organization, and doing things the right way, whether that's following a style guide or documenting my work so others can understand it.

What draws me to this role specifically is the balance between design and implementation. It aligns with where I am in my journey right now—someone who is still growing, but ready to contribute, collaborate, and continue developing in a real-world environment.

I would truly appreciate the opportunity to be considered and to continue growing within a team like yours.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,
Adeola Ekundayo
